Lottery Winner Dumps $200,000 Worth of Manure on his Former Boss's Lawn

By Lofono Zalaria

A former employee did something many dream of doing but few dare to try: he got back at his boss. Brian Morris, a 54-year-old from Illinois, won the lottery last week, landing him $125 million. When reporters asked him what he'd spend his winnings on, he replied "Just read the news, you'll see."

Morris quit his job. Then he ordered $200,000 worth of manure and asked the manure company to dump it on his boss's property (Morris told the company it was his home.) George Fitzgerald, the boss, woke up Tuesday to see trucks dumping 20,000 tons of manure on his lawn. Morris stood across the street, laughing.

Fitzgerald called the police, who arrived 15 minutes later. When the police questioned Morris, the lottery winner explained that now that he was rich, it was payback time.

"The accused told us he'd worked for the victim for 17 years and was treated like shit. He says he had to endure his mistreatment because he needed the money, but that now that he won $125 million, it was time for revenge," said Frank Meyers, a spokesperson for the police department.
